The quality of the nation's drinking water has improved markedly in the past 15 years, with a 100 percent reduction in health-related illnesses from waterborne disease. The decades-long efforts have been aided by regulation, water treatment, and water-quality monitoring and management. However, many challenges remain. These include defining safe limits for those pathogens that are currently not regulated, monitoring water for toxic chemicals and pharmaceuticals, and understanding the effects of increased human use of natural resources and energy production on groundwater. These complex issues continue to challenge and concern the quality of the nation's drinking water, and the nation's ability to address these challenges remains a research priority. One significant opportunity is the increasing integration of water and wastewater treatment into policy and planning. A greater national commitment to address the need for water quality is needed to assure the nation's drinking water security.1.
